

JENATZY SHOT DEAD.

Famous Belgian "Red Devil" Auto Racer Killed in Hunting Accident.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Dec. 8.—A tragic shooting accident occurred last night at Habay la Neuve, in the Belgian Ardennes, when Camille Jenatzy, a Belgian sportsman and motorist, was shot by Alfred Madoux, director of the journal L'Etoile Belge. M. Jenatzy died from his injury.

Dusk was falling, and the shooting party were about to return home when M. Madoux caught sight of a roebuck and fired. The shot, an explosive bullet, struck M. Jenatzy in the thigh. He was rushed to the nearest doctor in a motor car, but bled to death on the way.

M. Jenatzy was winner of the Gordon Bennett Cup in 1903. He was an enthusiastic motorist as well as a successful business man. Red-bearded, lean, and highly nervous, he was nicknamed in England the "Red Devil." At one time he was regarded as the most daring of all racing motorists, his driving being characterized by demoniacal fury and stark determination.

As an illustration of his irascible temperament, it is related that during one race he jumped from his car and struck an inoffensive onlooker whose demeanor displeased him.

FLIER HURT IN GALE.

Makes a Bad Landing in His Trip Up the Hudson.

With a rib broken and his ankle sprained, Serg. Samuel Kapzman was brought in a motor car last evening to the home of his sister, Mrs. Samuel Siegle, at 2,037 Hughes Avenue, the Bronx, as a result of braving the afternoon's terrific gale in a hydroaeroplane.

The machine belonged to William Mackay of Nyack, and it had been Kapzman's ambition to fly it from Garrison to Albany in a race with the Twentieth Century Limited. He ventured forth yesterday afternoon, accompanied by his mechanic, Samuel Metz. They flew the stretch to Haverstraw—ten miles as the crow flies—and there they encountered such wind as made them think only of landing.

Their original scheme of coming down to the surface of the Hudson was frustrated by the opposition of the gale, and then Kapzman made for a lake near Little Ferry, where he hoped to make a water landing. He missed the lake and hit the ground. The machine was wrecked. Metz escaped with even slighter injuries than those which penalized the flier, and he, too, came to his home in the Bronx at 2,037 Hughes Avenue.

DOG BITES TWO CHILDREN.

Attacks by Animal Still at Large Alarm Elmhurst Parents.

The children of Public School 89, on Fifth and Sixth Streets, Elmhurst, L. I., were at play in the noon recess yesterday when a black and white mongrel dog ran into the yard and jumped at the throats of several of them. Before it could be driven away, Lucy Bracken, 7 years old, was bitten on the cheek, and William Scolnich, 6 years old, was bitten on the lip.

The children were taken to the offices of Dr. S. A. Wood, who cauterized the wounds and recommended their removal to the Willard Parker Hospital for treatment. The dog ran out of the yard and away before the police could be called.

All day long the police hunted for the animal. Last night other cases were reported in Elmhurst and, it seemed probable, from the description of the dog, that it was the same one which had attacked the school children. At a late hour last night the dog had not been found.

The anxiety of the Elmhurst dwellers was increased by the fact that on the night before a dog belonging to a family named Walters, on Whitney Avenue, had died under circumstances which indicted that it was suffering from rabies. Its head was removed and taken to the Willard Parker Hospital for examination.
